To the Editor—The use of the Supreme Court decision outlawing segregation in education as a public relations weapon against current Communist criticism of the United States is a dangerous device.

During our soiled linen before the world, in spite of this decision. Thirdly, it is quite evident that much more than a law or decision is required before the evil effects of racial dualism are erased from our culture.

In the first place, this welcome decision was long overdue for millions of Americans, not because we want to look well before our world neighbors, but rather because it was right that inequalities be officially removed by our Government.

Instead of boasting of an over-set about the task of defeating southern resistance and building integrated relationships in both north and south. When we accomplish the goal of integration, we will not have to worry about what others think about us. They will know the truth.

More Than Law Required to Erase Effects of Racial Problems

To the Editor—The use of the Supreme Court decision outlawing segregation in education as a public relations weapon against current Communist criticism of the United States is a dangerous device.

In the first place, this welcome decision was long overdue for millions of Americans, not because we want to look well before our world neighbors, but rather because it was right that inequalities be officially removed by our government.

Secondly, southern stubbornness may be effective in further airing our soiled linen before the world, in spite of this decision.

Thirdly, it is quite evident that much more than a law or decision is required before the evil effects of racial dualism are erased from our culture.

Instead of boasting of an overdue accomplishment, we should set about the task of defeating southern resistance and building integrated relationships in both north and south. When we accomplish the goal of integration, we will not have to worry about what others think about us. They will know the truth.
